The College Sports Project represents more than 80 colleges and universities in the NCAA's Division III who are committed to strengthening the bonds between intercollegiate athletics and educational values. These institutions share a common value that intercollegiate athletes should be much like their peer students in important ways; athletes should be “representative” of the student bodies at their own institutions. A national project in data collection and analysis, the CSP is an initiative of The Andrew W. Mellon Foundation which aims to provide data and useful analyses to presidents and other leaders of the member institutions. The eleven members of the New England Small College Athletic Conference, including Middlebury, are founding members of the CSP. Professor Emerson will provide an overview of the national project with a review of some findings to date. He will also review some general findings for NESCAC and Middlebury as they relate to the broader national context for Division III.
