Getting the Classes You Want

I sometimes hear frustrations voiced by students that they aren't able to get into the classes they need for their major. The funny thing is, this is by design. The liberal arts push people to consider things from multiple disciplines, perspectives, and viewpoints. Seeking out opportunities to learn more about the unfamiliar, or in other words being curious, is a core facet of Wisdom and Knowledge. Not only will a broad understanding of knowing how we know help you do better in your intended area of study, it will also help you learn how to have critical conversations and become an engaged citizen of the world. Feeling curious? Here is one perspective about the value of the liberal arts.

Resources

If you are still unsure about how a class in an unfamiliar subject has any relevance to your education, set up a meeting with your First Year Seminar Professor. They may be able to share insight about really important connections that you haven't considered. And if the hesitation is coming from feeling uneasy about the material, be sure to attend your professor's office hours any time you have a question. Finally, know that you can always make an appointment with a tutor in the Center for Teaching, Learning, and Research for extra help when you need it.
